"It's about the double standards of white people and coloured people during terrorist attacks and when they do charitable things. It shows that whenever someone of colour does a terrorist attack it's blamed on their skin colour or religion whereas a white person can do a lot worse yet no one blames our skin colour. Then, it's supposed to be a contrast when they are both doing charitable things because people will praise white people for donating etc but if a person of colour donates for example the irony is that it doesn't get the same attention. So, we are so quick to put the attention on someone of colour for something bad but will never praise them for the opposite."
